Tullibardine 500

The Tullibardine 500 is based on the Tullibardine Sovereign and undergoes a 12-month finish in a classic sherry cask, which should be familiar to any whisky enthusiast.

TASTING NOTES

NOSE

Vanilla and malt open the nose of this Highland whisky. A hint of sherry paired with butterscotch merges with fermented fruit (apple, pear), giving it a slightly acidic flavour.

PALATE

The whisky is soft and creamy, almost watery on the tongue. The classic fig and date flavours from the sherry cask would round off the taste well if it weren't for the disturbing ethanol note. Too bad.

FINISH

Unfortunately, the 500's finish is short and bitter.

THOUGHTS

MARCEL

Unfortunately, the Tullibardine 500 comes across as somewhat thin, with the sherry influence remaining rather subtle. Despite a slight improvement in quality compared to the Sovereign, it lacks the character that truly makes drinking it enjoyable – I would have hoped for more depth and warmth here.

SASCHA

From a structural standpoint, the Tullibardine 500 feels unbalanced and weakly defined, with the sherry finish staying superficial. The distracting ethanol note and the short, bitter finish undermine the harmony, so the cask finish only marginally enhances the whisky's potential.
